- Does the report have title page, authors, date, page numbers? Yes, everything seems to enumerated and structured.

- Does the report have an introduction, results and/or conclusions? The introduction is nicely written and the results are separated into the different sections, which makes it nice and easy to follow. The conclusion is a bit short and named final remarks. That's understandable, because discussion of the different results are done in the same section as the results were presented.

  The layout of the report is a matter of taste, I think both ways of presenting conclusion and analysis are feasible.

- Has the report been proof read? Yes, there doesn't seem to be any apparent spelling errors throughout the report.

- Have language and spelling mistakes been corrected? See above.

- Are figures and tables: Numbered? Equipped with suitable captions? Referred to in the text? Figures and tables: are numbered and equipped with suitable captions. They're also referred to in the text.

- Is the text divided into paragraphs and well structured with clear and suitable section headings? Yes I think so. A very clean and structured report.

- Is the report easy to read, and understandable without access to the project description? Yes, I think it is.

- Have all the tasks in the assignment been completed? In section 2 c) you haven't calculated the confidence interval of your estimates, this can be done manually. Other than that I can't find anything else.

- Does the report contain relevant figures and tables? Yes, they've been done in LateX it seems in a structured manner; which is nice to read.

- Has all notation been properly introduced and/or explained? Yes, I think so.

- Has the model been properly introduced? The different models that have been tested throughout the project have always been introduced in the report.
